Sir Alexander Spoarman, its former From this point, by a most about transition, head was in constant communication with Mr. the learned counsel harked back to the the Soudamore, and acted in a part of this very melade of Lady Tichborne, and proceeded to subject no an ambussador from him to the state over again his reasons for apposing that Treasury. The Post-office had cented to pay she was perfectly sane, and fully able to judge, in with the regularity with which they bad correctly of the Claimant's identity. He supused to pay, and a single question mked of Mr. Soudsmore must have revealed the nath. der ordinary circumstances he ought dearly to bave perceived what was in progress. - But it appears that during the worst months of the matter Sir Alexander Spearman was almost ineapable of business, and he has now resigned. after a long and useful public service, from age and illbealth, and it would therefore be very bard and unjust to apply to him a severe consure. As soon as bie successor, Mr. Rivers Wilson, was appointed, he at once wrote to Mr. Boudamore, and received £170,100 "on account" immediately. But by that time the whole scandal had become notorious. The authority, for seeing that the Postal Revenue is duly paid by the Post Office is the Treasury, and between it and Mr. feudamore there is a hot and long controversy. At first he contended that the Treasury know all about But this allegation is now asbatantially. withdrawn. On his last examination Mr. Scudemore says, after some observations in his exculpation; "I do not for one moment pretend that I was not bound to give the Treasury an official knowledge of what was going on; I am responsible for the unission." To those who look direfully at the matter the truth is very plain, Mr. Soudamore thought the Treasury knewall about it, and the Treasury had no real idea of it. The two parties looked it the matter with different eyes. Mr. Foudamore "being comer about telegraphs, full of telegraphs, and thinking 'ooly of telegraphs," thought that it was notorious that he was extending telegraphs at a great rate. for which there would be a heavy bill to pay, and that the Tremury knew it like the rest of the world. With his eager mind, he thought it only natural to take the first money which came to hand for this good purpose. But to the Treasury, on the other band, it was probably incongivable that on his own responsibility any one would spend £300,000 contrary to law for any public service. Such excessive zeal-is not common: the whole thing is out of the "usual line." So far from being surprised that such a conjecture was not made by the officials of the Treasury, or that an inference was not driwn by them from some dubinus words of Mr. Scudamores, we can hardly imagine their consternation when the truth was at last revolled. Even after proof, decolous officials in general could hardly be - brought to credit the real existence of auch air ningal outbreak of pure devotion, and as to their supposing it without proof, they would as som have suspected utter lunacy. This defence does not, of course, include Mr Irowe, this mind, at all events, is not warped, by the habits of minor office. But probably this alleged enthusiasm for the public good would not have seemed very likely to him. And he admits, on another point, that he is to

"But you could have hardly remained under the idea that all works since in excess of those mentioned by Mr. Scudamore had been suspended ?-- Nor I am afraid that, in the multiplicity of affairs, our attention was not irected to that as it ought to have been. ankly adinit that."

And this is no doubt that truth. If myone had set himself to think, "Where does Boudamore got his money from? He is plately extending telegraphs at it vast rate, where does the eashall done from P" the whole truth would have been displosed months since; or, ather, the beginnings of the business would have been disclosed, and the main part would hever have happered.,

The real moral is, as we said before, that we much change our idea of the office of Postmaster General. We must consider it not a nominal or somi-neminal office, but a year and laborious one: We do not wish to turn ont Mr. Monsell for what has happened; it would be unjust to do so he only accepted the old !" ways and usages, which he found; but a Postmaster-General aught to be furned out for meh a matter; if the office were well arranged, he would be so turned out. Lows and the Tressury are to blame no doubt but if the interior of a great department is emuntially ill-constructed, its working cannot be kept right by a distant office with multifurious business, or a Cabinet Minister who has no special reason to think of this and much reason to think of other matters.

By way of strengthening his point, the learnedcounsel referred to Roger's letter to Gosford, written on the lith of Febrnary, 1853, in which he says, "I heard from Lady Doughty some time ago. She gave me II OUSE, SHIP, AND STEAMBOAT but little news. You may us well give up your bet." Dr. Kenealy went on to argue that Gosford wasprivy to a must bideous secret, and had a bet with Roger upon its probable sue. This suggestion provoked a sharp discussion, in the course of which Dr. Kenealy bitterly complained that the prosecution had denied him even tice most limited assistance, and that he had not so much as a copy of the Attorney-General's speech. Mr. Hawking, however, on the part of the Treasury, met the complaint with a direct denial, declaring that the Crown lad given at ber, will proceed to Southampton via the Sack following facts are submitted for consideration, the assistance that could be reasonably expected (anyl. of it; while Mr. Justice Mellor observed that he had hedrd complaints reiterated day by day against the presecution antil Le was weary of them, It appeared, however, that beyond all doubt the dearned counsel had not got a copy of Sir John Coleridge's speech; and the Lord Chief Justice accordingly most kindly handed down his own copy, saying, Mark it as much as you please, Dr. Kenealy, so long, is you return it." Maliers being the pleasantly arranged, the learned counsel west on to ask why Jules Barrant had not been put into the witness-box, and to argue that the defendant bad told Mr. Gibbesa story about a mule falling over a precipies, which was known to Roger Tichborne, but which could not possibly have been known to Arthur Orton. Allusion was then made to a witness, whose name was not mentioned, who is to prove that he met Roger Tichhorne at Rioshortly before his embar, kation on the Bello, and that Roger had a brown mark on hisside. The Lord Chief Instice observed that, in any .coe care must be taken to get the trial over before the first day of next term, the 3rd-of November. A QUEER DINNER. Another "anecdote" bas fortunately been left out of Colonal Forney's delightful book Once upon a time one of those giant intellects of a past generation gave a large dinner party at one of the fushiouable hotels at the Capital. A private table had been set in one of the parlours, the hour of the feast bad arrived, the guests were assembled, the dinner was perfect, but astonishment reigned supreme, for the rost himself was nowhere to be found. Among the guests might have been seen the majestic forms of Cass and Benton. Massachusetts was represented by the immortal Webster, whilst the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania had contributed her most distinguished son in the person of James Buchaman. Forest was there enveloped in the rosy rave of his dawning fame, whilst the author of the "Anecdotes of Public Men " might have been mistaken for a youthful Apollo, or some otherequally faultless heathen god. A vessel with crowded sails at sea without a commander, a balloon in the upper stratum without Professor Wise in the basket, the political ring in Pennsylvania without Simon Cameron, could only represent the situation; but James Buchanan, with his superb grace and inimitable tact, managed the social ship while it was in the midst of the breakers. "Gentlemen," said the lordly Buchanan, " we are bidden here to partake of this fine dinner. The wing is cool-all things seem ready. is true the host is absent, but that is no reason why so good a feast should spoil. Be sented, friends Life is brief! Let us, enjoy ourselves!" The hours flew away on nimble-wings; course after course groaned upon the table. The honest wines of those Apiciau days bubbled, sparkled and disappeared. The air was heavily charged with the electricity of genius; yet in the absence · of the host-all was serene. At last the hour of departure came. It was eleven o'clock. . The door opened, and there stood the host Angels and ministers of grace defend us! His buttered hat sat jauntily on one side of his handsome bead. His sharp, white teeth still clung to the fragments of a fast disabpearing cigar, "Gentlemen," he began "I've been to Genraetown, hic!" . Said Mr. Buchanan to some of the more youthful of the company: "Take this man to his room; he might any something he would regret," and so the host was led without opposition away. Next day, when explanations and apologies were duly sent forth, they were received in the kindest spirit, because Mr. Buchanan had paved the way for them the night before, by saying to the company, " Our host has been unfortunate. "At this time the selling of Geneva in a less quantity than two gallons was prohibited by Act of Parliament, and whoever presumed to do it must pay ten pounds to the Informer, or be confined two months in prison and there whipt. Most of the gaols: were full on adcount of this Act, and the numbers of people every day drawged to one prison or other for transgressing this Law.

"The mob being very noisy and clamorous for want of their beloved liquor, which few or none at last dared to sell, it soon occurred to me to venture upon that trade. I bought the Act, and read it over several times, and I found no authority by it to break open doors, and that the informer must know the name of the person who rented the house it was sold in. To evade this, I got an aquaintance to rent a house in Blue Anchor Alley, in St. Luke's Parish, who privately conveyed his hargain to me; I then got it well secured, and laid out in a bed and other furniture five pounds, in provision and drink that would keep about two pounds, and purchased in Moorfields the sign of a cat and had it nailed to a street window; then caused a leaden pipe, the small end out an inch, to be placed under the paw of the cat; the end that was within had a funnel

"When my house was ready for business, I inquired what distiller in London was most famous for good gin, and was assured by several that it was Mr. I -- dale in Holborn. At night I took possession of my den, and got up early next morning to be ready for custom; it was nearly three hours before anybody called, which made me almost despair of the project; at last I heard the chink of money, and a comfortable 15 per cent. voice say 'Puss, give me two pennyworth of gin. finstantly put my mouth to the tube, and bid them receive it from the pipe under ver cent on their paid up Capital, distribute 25 Policies issued for long or short periods at her paw, and then measured and poured it per cent. of the surplus of the profits pro rata into the funnel, from whence they soon received it.
